Eleni Boukoura Altamoura - Biography

She is noted as being the first great female painter of Greece. The tragedies she experienced in her life were the subject of Greek author Rhea Galanaki's novel Eleni, or, Nobody, which was later adapted into a play. Eleni was born on the island of Spetses in 1882. She was the daughter of Yannis Boukouras, a wealthy aristocrat and entertainer who had opened one of the first theaters in Athens. Eleni developed an interest in art from a young age. Seeing this, her father hired Italian artist Raffaello Cecchi as a tutor for his daughter. She continued her studies, and at the age of 27 left for Naples with a letter of recommendation from Cecchi to begin her education as an artist. While studying in Naples and Florence, she dressed as a man in order to attend art classes. While studying in Italy, Eleni began a relationship with Italian painter Francesco Saverio Altamura, with whom she had 3 children. She later converted to Catholicism and married Altamura to legitimize the relationship, though her husband would eventually leave Eleni for his mistress. She relocated to Athens, where Eleni made a living through painting and teaching art lessons. In 1898 she and her daughter Sophia moved to her family home on Spetses when Sophia contracted tuberculosis. Sophia died of the disease before the end of the year at the age of 18, and so Eleni returned to Athens in 1902. Her son Ioannis, himself a noted Spetsian painter, finished his studies in Copenhagen and returned to live with his mother in Athens. Just as with his sister before him, Ioannis contracted tuberculosis, succumbing to the disease in 1908. After his death, she turned some of her son's paintings along with many of her own works and personal items over to the National Archaeological Museum.
